

FCC:

New Jersey's "Do Not Call" law is vital to the health and welfare of the state's families, and a model for the country. Any agency that would deliberately weaken the law would be openly attacking families for the sake of unwanted and unnecessary commerce, disregarding the clear desires of millions. Instead of weakening NJ's terrific "Do Not Call" law, the FCC should be focusing its attention on closing the loophole it created with unwanted Internet spam. The very fact that NJ's "Do Not Call" law works -- while the federal government's measures to curb spam have failed -- should be a clear sign that any problem in the telemarketing area lies closer to the Potomac than Paramus. The government should clean up its own mess first, and ask Governor Cody for help, direction and guidance.
